A guide to the media relations aspects of opening a law firm office in London

Along with New York, London is one of the two major global centers for international law. Despite the uncertainties following the UK referendum on leaving the European Union, it remains an attractive location for US law firms.

Clearly there are many important strategic and operational issues to consider when launching a new office but getting the media and communications right can be crucial for success. Launch coverage is the first – and often best – opportunity to tell potential and existing clients and introducers what you are looking to achieve, as well as being an effective recruitment advertisement.

Gaining good media coverage – and avoiding any negatives – is important internally too, both for the London team and elsewhere in the firm, for fostering a positive attitude in and toward the new office. It also sets the tone for your future interactions with the UK media.

British reporters work and behave differently to their colleagues in the United States. The UK legal media in particular has a very specific way of working – they are highly competitive and extremely interested in the workings, management and comings-and-goings of lawyers and law firms in London. This brings both opportunities and dangers.

The UK media landscape

The national/business media

The UK retains a vibrant – though not entirely commercially viable – national news media. There are currently nine daily national newspapers: The Times, The Daily Telegraph, The Guardian, Daily Mail, Daily Express, i, The Sun, The Daily Mirror and the Financial Times. Few – rarely even the Financial Times – include news about law firms, though reporters are open to quoting legal experts within their stories. The Times runs a weekly law section (on Thursdays) and produces a daily newsletter that includes law firm news.

Similarly, the broadcast media – both TV and radio – are largely not interested in law firms themselves but are occasionally interested in the expert opinions of lawyers.

The legal media

Law is one of the most competitive media sectors in the UK. There are numerous publications looking at various aspects of the law and lawyers – Law Society Gazette, The GI obal Legal Post, Lawyer Monthly, New Law Journal, Legal Futures – but there are three titles that stand out for importance for US law firms in London: The Lawyer, Legal Week and Legal Business.

The Lawyer is the oldest of the three. It still produces a weekly hardcopy magazine though much of the news now is online. It takes a keen interest primarily in corporate/City law firms with a focus around the people and personalities. The senior editorial team is very experienced and know their market well.

Legal Week was launched in 1999 by a breakaway team from The Lawyer and in early 2016 was bought by The American Lawyer's publisher, ALM. Now online only, it is an archrival of The Lawyer for news and revenue and includes largely the same sort of content.

Legal Business is a monthly magazine as well as online news site. It pitches itself as for the management level within law firms and focuses mostly on strategic issues.

All three have a robust and critical editorial tone and their reporters take little at face value. They are also highly competitive with one another, and will be aware of what their rivals are covering and who in the market they are talking to. They all enjoy legal gossip and it is from there that many of their stories start.

There are also two online-only legal news sites similar to Above The Law – RollOnFriday and Legal Cheek – that have a strong focus on the humorous side of the legal sector, usually with a satirical twist. RollOnFriday is notorious for its aggressive style and most law firms hope not to find themselves tangled up in one of its stories.

10 media relations issues to consider for an office launch in London

01 Leak plan

The legal media in London are very well networked and reporters actively build relationships with legal recruiters and the office property market. Rumors of exploratory conversations with merger partners or recruiters can very easily find their way into the media. Legal publications such as The Lawyer, Legal Business and Legal Week are highly competitive and 'scoops' involving mergers or office launches are valuable property. Unless categorically denied, UK reporters will happily report news based on unattributed sources.

A leak plan is needed from the outset – even at the most tentative, research stage – and needs to be updated as and when your plans develop.

02 Translation

It creates a positive impression if you 'translate' all communications into British English. This is not just about spellings and the choice of specific words; the style of communications such as press releases are substantially different to those in the United States.

03 Spokespeople

Ensure you have spokespeople who are available to give interviews and that they are well briefed. Ideally this should be the London office head (if you have one yet) and the firm's global leader (global managing or senior partner). Consider the impact of time zones if they are unable to be physically in London on launch day.

Media training — even for experienced media operators — is recommended as British journalists work differently to US reporters, with different 'unwritten rules' and expectations.

O4 Difficult questions

British reporters will actively seek out diffcult issues to provide some negative 'balance' to what may otherwise be a wholly positive story. They do not like writing only the story they are 'given'. You need to be prepared for a wide range of questions, some of which may appear unrelated to your launch in London, seemingly misguided or outright impertinent. Preparing for as many awkward questions as possible will enable you to deal with them with good humor and without saying anything you will later regret.

05 Managing expectations

The UK legal media are interested in US law firms coming to the UK. However, law firms' plans are rarely reported on in the national/business media, not even the Financial Times. Bloomberg will sometimes cover law firm developments as will a daily briefing produced by The Times (but separate from The Times newspaper and website).

Consequently, expectations within your firm about where your launch is likely to be covered in the UK media need to be carefully managed.

06

Key facts

Have all your key facts and data ready for journalists to use. This saves them having to look them up (and possibly getting them wrong). Include numbers of offices, headcount and key people biographies.

The UK legal media are keen on financial metrics (such as turnover and profits per partner) – don't be surprised if you are asked for these.

07 Timing

There are likely to be internal drivers for the timing but you also need to consider the local business agenda as well as national holidays and other events. Ignore this and your launch could get lost or clash/combine with other news events. Timing in terms of day of the week is less important than it once was now that most news is driven by the online versions of the legal media.

You also need to consider your strategy for approval from the Solicitors Regulation Authority (if required). It can take some months to gain approval so you need to decide when along that process would be the best time for your public announcement.

08 Exclusives

We are often asked about the benefit of offering an exclusive to one media outlet to ensure positive coverage and build a good relationship with a particular publication or journalist. This can be a good strategy but it does come with drawbacks. The UK legal publications are intensely competitive and the benefit of an exclusive needs to be weighed against the risk of getting off on the wrong foot with those journalists/publications not given the story first.

09 Standing out

British journalists are hard to impress. While the UK legal media will be keen to hear news of your launch into London, don't expect them to write reports glowing with praise for your firm. Unless you do not mind being written up as "another US law firm coming to London" you will need to prepare messaging on what makes you different and why they and their readers should take an interest in what you are doing.

It is important that you are seen as having a clear and long-term strategy for London – one that appeals to potential recruits and well as clients.

10 Momentum

The launch should be the start of a positive relationship with the UK media. It is an opportunity for your spokespeople to build relationships with some key reporters. Consider offering follow-up interviews a suitable number of months after the launch to provide an update. Ensure you push out news on new hires and other developments.

There are a lot of US law firms in London; you need to keep up a regular dialogue to stay on the media's radar as a firm for them to follow.

Recent experiences

How have the most recent US law firm openings in London played out in the media?

Boies Schiller

Boies Schiller launched in London in September 2014, though the launch had been long anticipated since taking on a Bingham partner nearly a year before. Continued lateral hires and an interview by the firm's managing partner with The Lawyer enabled the firm to keep a low-key legal media presence.

BuckleySandler

Financial services and financial crime specialist BuckleySandler's London office was its first outside of the United States. It launched with a single partner who relocated from Washington, DC to advise on US law. It stated it had no intentions to practice UK law. It achieved coverage in The Lawyer and Legal Business on launch but has kept a low profile since.

Cooley

Cooley is the largest US law firm launch into London in recent years. The firm built an immediate London platform taking on 55 lawyers from Edwards Wildman and Morrison & Foerster in January 2015, and has continued to hire lawyers aggressively into London. Consequently Cooley has rarely been out of the UK legal media since. It has continued the dialogue with the media and is outspoken about its ambitions. Regular new hires and other initiatives provide a regular flow of news.
